

Criminal Protection For The Inviolability of Private Life

Comparative analytical study

Prepared by : Julia Omran Mohammad Abu Sbeih

Supervisor : Dr. Nail Taha

Criminal Protection For The Inviolability of Private Life

ABSTRACT:

The idea of private life is one of the most important human rights in general, and human rights in particular.

The nature of the idea of private life as a flexible and changing nature according to the customs and traditions, time, place and people, the protection of the privacy of life varies according to the time and place in addition to the different political, economic and social system prevailing in each country, both national and international legislation in addition to international conferences to provide Protection of privacy.

Due to the continuous and unlimited development of scientific and technological progress led to the emergence of new crimes that were not previously known and which led to increased risks to the deprivation of private life. It was necessary for legislation to put laws in place to protect the right to private life in return for this technological development. In this letter we dealt with the criminal protection of the deprivation of private life and the importance of protection for individuals and society, and how to protect them according to the difference in place and time and their dependence on the customs and traditions prevailing in each country. Balancing between the interests of the individual and his or her community and keeping them together or alone.

We talked about the role of the Palestinian legislator in protecting the inviolability of private life, whether its role in protecting the sanctity of the house or the lives of people from personal conversations to telegrams and e-mail. The Jordanian Penal Code No. 16 of 1960, which is in force in Palestine, dealt with the crimes of anyone who violates the prohibition of private life.

Recently, a decision was issued in Palestine on the Electronic Crimes Law No. 10 of 2018, which in turn protects crimes against the inviolability of private life.